Human Rights Council

Thirty-second session

Agenda item 3

Promotion and protection of all human rights, civil, political, economic, social and cultural rights,
including the right to development

Report of the Special Rapporteur on extrajudicial, summary or arbitrary executions on his mission to Ukraine

Note by the Secretariat

The Secretariat has the honour to transmit to the Human Rights Council the report of the Special Rapporteur on extrajudicial, summary or arbitrary executions on his official visit to Ukraine from 8 to 18 September 2015. In the report, the Special Rapporteur presents his main findings, including comments on the legal framework concerning the protection of the right to life, and concerns regarding the absence of accountability for violations in the context of demonstrations in 2014 and during the conduct of the armed conflict in eastern Ukraine.

The Special Rapporteur makes recommendations to all parties to the conflict, to the Government, to the international community and to civil society to prevent unlawful killings and ensure better protection of the right to life.

I. Introduction

1. At the invitation of the Government of Ukraine, the Special Rapporteur conducted an official visit to the country from 8 to 18 September 2015. The Special Rapporteur thanks the Government for extending the invitation, as well as for the open and cooperative approach of the officials with whom he met. He also thanks the United Nations Human Rights Monitoring Mission in Ukraine for its invaluable support.

2. During the visit, the Special Rapporteur held meetings in Kyiv, Zaporizhzhya, Mariupol, Donetsk, Kramatorsk, Kharkiv and Odesa.

3. The Special Rapporteur met with representatives of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, the Ministry of Justice, the Ministry of Defence, the Ministry of Internal Affairs, the Office of the Military Prosecutor, the Security Service of Ukraine, the Headquarters of the Anti-Terrorism Operation, the National Security and Defence Council, the High Specialized Court on Civil and Criminal Cases, the Parliamentary Committee on Human Rights and the Parliamentary Commissioner for Human Rights (Ombudsperson), including her national preventive mechanism.

4. The Special Rapporteur also met with representatives of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) Special Monitoring Mission to Ukraine, the General Consulate of the Russian Federation in Odesa and other international and national monitors, non-governmental organizations and civil society, as well as with the families of victims.

5. After crossing the so-called “contact line” and traveling to Donetsk, the Special Rapporteur met with representatives of various monitoring missions, the “office of the commissioner for human rights” (“ombudsperson”) of the self-proclaimed “Donetsk people’s republic” and the “bar association”. He regrets that, despite significant efforts on the part of the United Nations Human Rights Monitoring Mission in Ukraine to arrange meetings, no other representatives of the self-proclaimed “Donetsk people’s republic” would meet with him. He shares the concerns of the Mission about the lack of accountability for the grave human rights violations and abuses that have reportedly taken place in the territories controlled by the armed groups. The Special Rapporteur was also able to visit the outskirts of the city of Donetsk, including the area surrounding the airport, and to see with his own eyes the extensive damage caused, particularly to civilian infrastructure and domiciles, by heavy shelling.

6. The Special Rapporteur regrets that he was unable to visit the Autonomous Republic of Crimea and the city of Sevastopol,<sup>1</sup> the status of which has been determined by General Assembly resolution 68/262. He was aware of allegations of serious violations of human rights in that territory, and reiterates that, in order to ensure the protection of all human rights, including the right to life, international missions such as the United Nations Human Rights Monitoring Mission in Ukraine should be given unimpeded access to this area. When meeting with the consulate of the Russian Federation in Odesa, the Special Rapporteur underscored the need for such visits to take place.

II. Background

7. In late November 2013, large-scale street protests took place in Ukraine, triggered by the decision of then-President Viktor Yanukovich not to sign an association agreement with the European Union. Underlying these protests appear to have been growing popular discontent related to the deterioration of economic and social conditions, widespread dissatisfaction with a system perceived as corrupt and lacking accountability, and weak rule-of-law institutions (see A/HRC/27/75, para. 3).

8. The grievances were exacerbated by the disproportionate use of force by security personnel. The violence reached a breaking point in mid-February 2014, when firearms were used against demonstrators, killing 77 people.<sup>2</sup> The lack of a proper investigation contributed to a lack of clarity around these events, with profound consequences for Ukraine. Shortly afterwards, Mr. Yanukovich was forced to step down and left the country, his Government was deposed and an interim Government formed on 27 February 2014.

9. In March 2014, the crisis broadened when paramilitary groups, so-called self-defence groups and other unidentified soldiers—widely believed to be from the Russian Federation<sup>3</sup>—took control of Crimea, and on 16 March organized a “referendum” in which voters were asked whether they wanted the “reunification” of Crimea with the Russian Federation or the “restoration” of the 1992 Constitution of the Autonomous Republic of Crimea. When, according to the de facto authorities, that poll returned a large majority in favour of unification with the Russian Federation, they signed an agreement with the Russian Federation on 18 March. In its resolution 68/262 of 27 March 2014, the General Assembly affirmed its commitment to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Ukraine within its internationally recognized borders, and underscored that the referendum had “no validity”. There are concerns that individuals could not exercise their right to freedom of expression and peaceful assembly, and there were credible allegations of harassment, arbitrary arrest, torture and targeting of activists and journalists who opposed the referendum (see A/HRC/27/75, para. 5). Serious human rights abuses against those opposing the process, including Crimean Tatars and pro-Ukrainian leaders, have continued since then.<sup>4</sup>

10. Also beginning in March 2014, as a result of the change of Government in Kiev, and the unification of Crimea with the Russian Federation, rallies were held, mainly in the eastern regions of Donetsk, Kharkiv and Luhansk, and in the south, notably in Odesa, which are predominantly inhabited by Russian-speaking Ukrainians. The main demand of these rallies was a referendum on the federalization of Ukraine or the union of certain regions with the Russian Federation, as well as recognition of Russian as a second state language. Supporters and opponents of that protest movement regularly clashed, with the first three deaths resulting on 13 and 14 March 2014.

11. Armed groups seized public buildings and police and security facilities across the Donetsk and Luhansk regions, setting up barricades and checkpoints in order to maintain control of the areas seized. On 13 April 2014, the Government announced the beginning of an “anti-terrorist operation”.<sup>5</sup> The situation rapidly escalated into an armed conflict between government forces and these armed groups.

12. The Government of Ukraine has accused the Russian Federation of deploying its troops in the Donetsk and Luhansk regions, of attacking Ukrainian armed forces both from across the border and from within Ukraine, and of providing weapons and military training to the armed groups. OSCE monitors have observed the flow of persons in military-style clothing between Donetsk and the Russian Federation.<sup>6</sup> Many of the Special Rapporteur’s government interlocutors alleged that the intervention of the Russian Federation was to blame for the loss of life and other human rights violations caused by the conflict. While repeatedly denying any involvement of regular Russian troops in Ukraine, the President of the Russian Federation did admit unspecified military participation of the Russian Federation in the conflict, indicating that “We never said there were not people there who carried out certain tasks, including in the military sphere”,<sup>7</sup> and congratulating the separatist armed groups for their “major success”.<sup>8</sup>

13. In certain districts of Donetsk and Luhansk regions under their control, the armed groups proclaimed the independence of the “Donetsk people’s republic” and the “Luhansk people’s republic” on 7 April 2014 and 27 April 2014, respectively. The armed groups held referendums for independence in the territories they controlled on 11 May, in the absence of international observers. Those referendums were not recognized by the Government of Ukraine. Since then, the United Nations Human Rights Monitoring Mission in Ukraine has observed a significant deterioration in the security and human rights situation throughout the conflict area, marked by grave violations of international human rights law and international humanitarian law on both sides of the conflict (murder, abductions, forced disappearances and torture and arbitrary detention of journalists, activists and other citizens), looting, social and economic hardship, the proliferation of illegal armed groups (both under and outside the control of the Ukrainian army and the self-proclaimed “Donetsk people’s republic” and “Luhansk people’s republic”), internal displacement and widespread impunity.<sup>9</sup>

14. On 25 May 2014, while presidential elections were being held in the rest of Ukraine, the populations of the Donetsk and Luhansk regions were prevented from exercising their vote by armed groups. The escalation in hostilities in urban areas between heavily armed men—allegedly including citizens of the Russian Federation and other foreigners—and Government forces caused grave violations of human rights and international humanitarian law, took a heavy toll on civilians and caused the internal displacement of 1,776,000 people, according to the Government of Ukraine.

15. Like other international observers, the Special Rapporteur welcomes the renewed ceasefire commitment announced in late August 2015 and the fact that this had been largely observed from 1 September 2015 until the time of his visit, and since.

<sup>9</sup> OHCHR, report on the human rights situation in Ukraine, 15 May 2014.

16. In June 2014, a trilateral contact group (Ukraine, the Russian Federation and OSCE) was established to facilitate dialogue between the various parties. On 5 September 2014, the group signed the Minsk Protocol, which included a ceasefire agreement and a 12-point peace plan, including the monitoring of the ceasefire by OSCE. On 19 September 2014, the Protocol was followed by a memorandum, which set the parameters for the implementation of the Protocol. The agreements, however, failed to prevent a new escalation of armed hostilities, which reached their peak between mid-January and mid-February 2015. A new ceasefire was agreed on 12 February 2015 as part of a package of measures for the implementation of the Minsk agreements, and entered into force on 15 February. The package of measures foresees the withdrawal of heavy weaponry from the “contact line”; the establishment of a 50-140 km security zone; the withdrawal of all foreign armed formations, military equipment and mercenaries from the territory of Ukraine; the disarmament of all illegal groups; and an “all for all” release of “hostages and unlawfully detained persons”. On 17 February 2015, in its resolution 2202 (2015), the Security Council called on all parties to fully implement the package of measures.

17. The Special Rapporteur notes that among the package of measures is a provision to enact legislation ensuring “pardon and amnesty” by forbidding prosecution or punishment in relation to events that have taken place in certain districts of the Donetsk and Luhansk regions. While supportive of measures aimed at de-escalating tensions, the Special Rapporteur is concerned that such legislation may foster impunity for grave violations of human rights by all parties. Any amnesty devised should be interpreted as not including immunity at least for international crimes, such as war crimes and crimes against humanity.

III. Legal framework

18. Ukraine is a state party both to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (European Convention on Human Rights), which (in their articles 6 and 2, respectively) both protect the inalienable right to life. The ultimate responsibility for the protection of the right to life in any country lies with its Government.

19. The right to life is protected in article 27 of the Constitution of Ukraine, which states that no one may be arbitrarily deprived of life and that it is the duty of the State to protect human life. Arbitrary deprivation of life is also penalized by several articles of the Criminal Code of Ukraine.<sup>10</sup>

20. On 7 November 2015, after the Special Rapporteur’s visit, the Law on National Police entered into force. The Law regulates the use of physical force, firearms and special equipment (which were previously covered by Government regulations), authorizes the use of force by the police only when necessary and proportionate, and requires police officers to inform their supervisors in writing of each incident in which physical force, firearms or special equipment has been deployed. The supervisor is also obliged to inform the relevant prosecutor. The Law establishes that the police have the obligation to give prior warning before using force, with the exception of cases in which a warning would be “unreasonable or impossible” (art. 43 (1)). The Law on National Police also includes an obligation for police officers to display their identification numbers at all times.

21. While the normative framework, including national legislation and international standards, is largely adequate for the protection of the right to life in Ukraine, its implementation remains highly problematic. In particular, there is a systematic lack of accountability for violations of the right to life.

22. Since 2014, the situation in certain districts of the Donetsk and Luhansk regions has triggered the applicability of international humanitarian law, in addition to international human rights law. The Special Rapporteur received reports of widespread violations of human rights in Crimea, including violations of the rights to freedom of expression, peaceful assembly and movement. He also received reports of concerns regarding the treatment of minorities. The Special Rapporteur regrets that monitoring of the human rights situation in Crimea is currently limited.<sup>11</sup>

23. Whether the allegations of the involvement of the Russian Federation in support of the armed groups in eastern Ukraine would in fact internationalize the conflict in certain districts of the Donetsk and Luhansk regions is a discussion that remains outside the scope of the present report. Regardless of the character of the conflict, all parties (including non-State actors) remain bound at least by customary international law, common article 3 of the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 and the general principles of distinction, necessity and the prohibition on causing unnecessary suffering.

24. The framing of the conflict as an anti-terrorism operation has led to considerable confusion among observers and monitors—and in some cases, it seems, among the participants themselves—about what domestic and international legislation applies, and who within the Government—the police, the intelligence services, or the army—is in control of the armed actions of the Government in eastern Ukraine. This contributes to uncertainty with regard to responsibility, and how accountability should be achieved.

25. On 5 June 2015, the Government of Ukraine announced that it would derogate from certain State obligations under the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights<sup>12</sup> and the European Convention on Human Rights.<sup>13</sup> The envisaged derogation is with respect to the rights to liberty and security, fair trial, effective remedy, respect for private and family life and freedom of movement, to be applied in certain districts of the Donetsk and Luhansk regions.<sup>14</sup> The derogation thus includes certain rights (including effective remedy and procedural rights, such as the supervision by judicial bodies of the lawfulness of detention) that the Human Rights Committee interprets as non-derogable. In relation to his mandate, the Special Rapporteur is concerned that these elements of the derogation may create an environment in places of detention that may facilitate incommunicado or secret detention, torture, ill-treatment, disappearances or executions. On 27 November 2015, the Government of Ukraine wrote a communication to the Secretary-General of the United Nations clarifying the geographic scope of its derogation from certain provisions of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. The Special Rapporteur is concerned that it includes a number of large towns and cities that remain under the effective control of the Government, such as Kramatorsk, Krasny Lyman, Sloviansk and Mariupol in the Donetsk region; and Lysychansk, Rubizhne and Severodonetsk in the Luhansk region.<sup>15</sup>

<sup>14</sup> The Government of Ukraine also made clear its view that the Russian Federation had committed an armed aggression against Ukraine and was “fully responsible” for ensuring respect of human rights and humanitarian law in Crimea and the areas of eastern Ukraine under the control of the armed groups.

<sup>15</sup> OHCHR, report on the human rights situation in Ukraine, 16 November 2015 to February 2016, paras. 166-167.

IV. Cooperation with international and regional organizations

26. On 15 March 2014, the United Nations Human Rights Monitoring Mission in Ukraine established by OHCHR initiated its activities in Kyiv at the invitation of the Government of Ukraine and in accordance with General Assembly resolution 68/262 of 27 March 2015 on the territorial integrity of Ukraine. The Mission has since extended its presence to Dnipropetrovsk, Donetsk, Kharkiv, Kramatorsk and Odesa, and also monitors the human rights situation in Crimea (albeit without a presence on the ground).

27. On 21 March 2014, the Permanent Council of OSCE decided to deploy a Special Monitoring Mission to Ukraine, with a mandate that includes gathering information on the security situation, as well as monitoring and supporting respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms. The OSCE Special Monitoring Mission has an extensive network of monitors and presences across Ukraine.

28. Ukraine has committed to accepting the jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court, and signed the Rome Statute in 2000, but a technical constitutional impediment has delayed ratification. The Special Rapporteur was assured that this impediment would be overcome in the proposed reform of the constitution, but in the meantime he welcomed the fact that on 8 September 2015 the Government had sent a declaration to the Office of the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court under article 12 (3) of the Rome Statute, giving to the Court ad hoc jurisdiction “for the purpose of identifying, prosecuting and judging the perpetrators and accomplices of acts committed in the territory of Ukraine since 20 February 2014”. The Prosecutor confirmed that she would open a preliminary examination in order to establish whether the criteria for opening an investigation had been met.<sup>16</sup>

V. Securing the right to life in wider Ukraine

29. International attention is paid mostly to the loss of life and other human rights violations that are occurring in certain districts of the Donetsk and Luhansk regions and Crimea. However, such attention should also be directed to other parts of the country.

A. Securing the right to life in the context of assemblies

30. A range of rights, in addition to the right to peaceful assembly, protects those who participate in assemblies (see A/HRC/31/66). Even if an assembly turns violent and the right to peaceful assembly no longer applies, the other rights remain in place. The right to life, for example, continues to apply during any assembly.

31. Officials with whom the Special Rapporteur met conveyed their understanding that the principal role of the police within the context of assemblies was to protect citizens. They pointed out that only in rare circumstances would police be sent carrying firearms to manage an assembly. Currently, the parliament of Ukraine is discussing new draft legislation on the right to peaceful assembly.

32. On at least two occasions in the recent history of Ukraine, however, the State has failed in its responsibility to manage large-scale assemblies appropriately, in both cases leading to a loss of life that has become emblematic of the current situation in Ukraine:

1. Maidan protests

33. Massive public gatherings and anti-Government demonstrations are not a new phenomenon in Ukraine. In 2004, large protests led to the Orange Revolution. In November 2013, protesters started to gather at Kyiv's Independence Square as part of a movement known as EuroMaidan ("European Square"), which demanded economic, social and political reform, the curbing of corruption and the strengthening of the rule of law. To some protesters, a closer integration with the European Union was seen as a desirable development, as they perceived the Government to be leaning progressively towards the Russian Federation. In eastern Ukraine, other citizens showed their support of the Government and expressed their opposition to ties with the European Union. On 24 November 2013, between 50,000 and 100,000 anti-Government protesters, including pro-European-Union sympathizers, gathered in the first demonstration at Independence Square in Kyiv. Pro-Government groups, including violent gangs (known as titushky) allegedly hired by the Government to "attack and intimidate" anti-Government demonstrators, also gathered at the square.<sup>17</sup>

34. The first instance of excessive use of force against demonstrators took place on 30 November 2013, when 290 riot police officers (special police unit known as the Berkut) dispersed protesters—mainly students and other young people—from the Square. Witness testimony and footage of the incident suggest that authorities used excessive force to clear demonstrators, including by chasing and beating demonstrators who ran away.<sup>18</sup> The violence escalated in the following days, with clashes in nearby streets between demonstrators and riot police. At least 50 riot police and hundreds of protestors were injured, and 12 persons detained on charges of "organizing mass disorder". Confrontations on 10 and 11 December 2013, after the riot police attempted to remove barricades, left up to 40 persons injured and 15 hospitalized, including law enforcement officers.<sup>19</sup> Clashes resumed on 19 January 2014, following the adoption of controversial new laws on 16 January limiting the ability to conduct unsanctioned public demonstrations.<sup>20</sup> Demonstrators, many of whom were linked to the far right-wing Right Sector group, attacked governmental buildings, throwing stones, firecrackers and Molotov cocktails at the police. The response of the police included the use of water cannons in sub-zero temperatures and live fire, as a result of which two demonstrators were injured by firearms.<sup>21</sup>

35. A Council of Europe panel<sup>22</sup> commissioned to assess the subsequent investigation found no evidence of meaningful investigation into any allegation of excessive force before 18 February 2014.<sup>23</sup> Over and above the failure of accountability that this represents, such a lack of investigation during the early period of the demonstrations inevitably meant that full investigations, once started, were hampered by the lapse of time.

<sup>18</sup> Ibid., paras. 9-23. The Advisory Panel referenced videos that seem to show instances of excessive force against the demonstrators.

<sup>20</sup> See OHCHR, report on the human rights situation in Ukraine, 16 August to 15 November 2015, para. 56.

<sup>21</sup> Report of the Council of Europe International Advisory Panel on its review of the Maidan investigations, paras. 53-57 and annex IX.

<sup>22</sup> See www.coe.int/en/web/portal/international-advisory-panel.

36. The violence in Kyiv reached its peak between 18 and 20 February 2014, when mass violent clashes took place mainly on Institutska Street. During those three days, around 90 people were killed, including 13 policemen, some by sniper shots that allegedly came from rooftops. It is not known who those snipers were, or to whom they answered. Investigations into this aspect of the violence have not reached any meaningful result, although it appears that this violence led to the largest number of intentional deaths and injuries. The former Minister of Health (who was in office from 27 February 2014 until 1 October 2014), Oleg Musii, was the chief of the medical services in the Maidan protests and a witness to the episodes of violence against demonstrators. He indicated to OHCHR that he saw law enforcement officers secretly removing bodies from Independence Square, which he suspected belonged to individuals who remain unaccounted for. He recounted cases of police brutality, including beatings and intimidation against medical staff, which prevented them from tending to the wounded (see A/HRC/27/75, para. 57). According to information gathered thus far, during the period from December 2013 to February 2014, in total 123 people lost their lives as a result of violence during the Maidan protests (some of them died in hospitals in March and June 2014). This number includes 106 persons with no connection to law enforcement (most of them protesters killed by firearms) and 17 officers of the internal affairs/police.

37. With respect to the use of force against protesters in the Maidan protests, most significantly between 18 and 20 February 2014, the Special Rapporteur is concerned that at least 77 persons were killed as a result of the firing of live ammunition, allegedly by Berkut and other law enforcement officers, at participants. As with any use of lethal force by police officers, it is vital that there be a prompt, thorough and impartial investigation into the events to establish whether the use of force was both necessary and proportionate.

38. The Special Rapporteur is greatly concerned by the apparent shortcomings of the investigation into these events.<sup>24</sup> While what process there is seems to be progressing very slowly, having reached court-level proceedings now in a very limited number of cases, there are more systemic failings. The escape of a principal suspect from house arrest, as well as the loss of a great deal of vital physical evidence, are both issues that should themselves be independently investigated.<sup>25</sup>

39. The Law on National Police was adopted on 2 July 2015 and fully entered into force on 7 November 2015, triggering the creation of a new police force. The national police has been established as a separate central executive body tasked with the provision of police services, as an attempt to depoliticize the police and give it a service-oriented approach.

2. Events of 2 May 2014 in Odesa

40. The Special Rapporteur visited Odesa and sought further information about the events of 2 May 2014, in which at least 48 people died in the context of clashes between rallies of people of opposing political opinions, to which authorities appear to have reacted in a deliberate, ill-prepared or negligent fashion. According to the accounts received from people who were at the scene, the police kept a low profile as the crisis evolved, and did not intervene to prevent or stop the violence at the Kulykove Pole Square. Indeed, credible footage appears to show at least one armed “pro-federalist” protester shooting at “pro-unity” protesters from behind the police cordon, with no attempt being made to arrest him. Police officers present at the scene allegedly responded to repeated requests by protesters to intervene to stop the violence that they had no orders to do so.

41. In the immediate aftermath of these clashes, some protesters retreated into the Trade Unions Building, which was situated close to one of the protest camps. After barricading themselves inside, dozens of people were ultimately killed, both by assailants and by a fire that engulfed the building. The fire brigade, which was located very close to the Trade Unions Building, where many protestors burned to death, failed to respond for 45 minutes to repeated, urgent calls that they received. According to the Government, emergency department officials are under investigation for criminal negligence due to the alleged failure to fulfil their duties.

42. There were numerous failings in the official investigation into the events of that day. While both “pro-unity” and “pro-federalist” groups played a part in the escalation of violence, subsequent criminal prosecutions for hooliganism or public disorder were initiated against participants in a partial fashion. Of the 48 persons killed, all but two were “pro-federalist” protestors. Of the 10 protesters who were detained, accused of “mass riot”, and still on trial at the time of the Special Rapporteur’s visit, all but two were also “pro-federalist”. Two years after the events, none of those responsible for the 48 deaths has been convicted. According to the Government, five persons are currently in custody on charges of rioting, unlawful handling of weapons and murder in relation to the 2 May 2014 events.

43. Moreover, by allowing almost immediate access to the scene by “pro-unity” protesters, members of the public and municipal authorities, investigators lost a large proportion of potentially valuable forensic evidence. As in the case of the lethal violence used in Maidan, the Special Rapporteur is concerned that no serious effort has been made to preserve critical evidence, and that investigations into these important events have been slow, thus far failing to produce any tangible result.

44. The Special Rapporteur is also concerned by indications that the Government has in the past year significantly reduced the size of the team investigating these events, before the team has had an opportunity to report. The slow progress of the investigation and the lack of transparency with which it is being conducted have contributed to a great deal of public dissatisfaction and provided a fertile environment for rumour and misinformation. The special unit of the Ministry of Internal Affairs that is investigating the 2 May events cancelled an appointment to meet with the Special Rapporteur in Odesa at the last moment without explanation.

45. The Special Rapporteur met with a group of families of some of the victims of those events. He was concerned to learn that administrative and personal impediments had been imposed to prevent or discourage families from obtaining the status of suffering or affected persons before the courts, and that, unlike the Maidan investigation, authorities had taken no coordinated measures to keep the next of kin informed of the status of the investigation. He was greatly alarmed by reports that authorities were tolerating verbal and physical intimidation, both of families attending court proceedings and of the judges in those cases, not only outside the court building, but also inside the building and in the courtroom itself.

B. Securing the right to life in the context of detention

46. Though issues concerning the treatment of detainees fall more directly within the mandate of the Special Rapporteur on torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, violence or other threats to life within detention facilities can lead directly to deaths for which the State has a heightened responsibility. For this reason, wherever possible, the Special Rapporteur visits places of detention during his country visits, to assess these threats first-hand.

47. It seems that the Office of the Ombudsperson and the national preventive mechanism created within it are relatively free to exercise their responsibilities to conduct unannounced visits to both pretrial detention facilities (SIZO) and penal colonies, and that this access provides an effective system of protection of the rights of detainees. Among the principal threats to life for detained persons in Ukraine are diseases such as tuberculosis and HIV. In the Donetsk region, for example, the rate of tuberculosis is allegedly 10 times higher in the prison population than in the general population. The Special Rapporteur welcomes the partnership between the Penitentiary Service and Médecins Sans Frontières, which provides specialized care to detainees with tuberculosis.

48. Detainees with whom the Special Rapporteur spoke had few complaints about conditions in the pretrial detention facilities. However, several made allegations of ill-treatment during earlier stages of their detention. There is a systematic pattern of complaints about ill-treatment at the hands of agents identified as members of the Security Service of Ukraine, whom one interlocutor described as “untouchable”.

49. The Special Rapporteur found it very difficult to establish from any officials he met the locations at which it was possible that such abuses might have taken place, whether police temporary detention facilities or other sites. He could find no evidence of a system of oversight that could effectively investigate any abuses that might occur or protect detainees against them. The consequence of such a lack of oversight was that officials could operate with impunity up until the time that detainees were handed over to the SIZO.

C. Violence by armed militia groups

50. While the majority of the “volunteer battalions” are said to have, from a military perspective, now been incorporated into the formal structures of the Ukrainian Armed Forces or the Ministry of Internal Affairs of Ukraine (the National Guard or otherwise), there remain a number of potentially violent militias, such as the Right Sector, that acted seemingly on their own authority, thanks to a high level of official toleration, and with almost complete impunity, both in the Donbass region and in wider Ukraine.

51. Of particular concern is the extent to which these groups use violence or threats of violence to exert pressure on persons holding dissenting views, the judicial system and other mechanisms of accountability. The Special Rapporteur is concerned by cases of physical attacks on journalists, writers, defence lawyers and judges, including the cases of Oles Buzyna (who was killed in April 2015 in Kyiv)<sup>26</sup> and Serhii Dolhov (who was arrested or disappeared on 18 June 2014 by masked armed men in civilian clothes in Mariupol and whose whereabouts continue to be undetermined despite indications that he might have been killed).<sup>27</sup> The Special Rapporteur is also concerned at an apparent pattern of intimidation of lawyers and judges by civilian armed groups in connection with their defence or investigation work related to the violence of 2 May 2014.

D. Accountability for violations

52. In many of his meetings with officials, the Special Rapporteur tried to explore the mechanisms of accountability that exist in current or proposed legislation and how they should function. As noted above, he left with the impression that in many instances the formal processes exist or will shortly exist. However, he remains concerned that, with the exception of the Office of the Ombudsperson and its national preventive mechanism, these processes are not being effectively used. Indeed, even the national preventive mechanism, which appears to be achieving its objective as a preventive mechanism, cannot fully act as an accountability mechanism, since it can only make recommendations to the Office of the Prosecutor, which is not compelled to take up cases.

53. Several practising lawyers with whom the Special Rapporteur met identified the reluctance of the Office of the Prosecutor to take on certain cases, combined with the close relationship between the Prosecutor and the judicial authorities, as the principal impediments to pursuing allegations of ill-treatment on behalf of their clients.

VI. Right to life in conflict-affected regions of eastern Ukraine

A. General observations on the conduct of hostilities

54. As noted above, the Special Rapporteur welcomes the fact that there have been only limited violations of the ceasefire on either side of the “contact line” since 31 August 2015. He hopes that this ceasefire continues to hold and that it provides a space for more thoroughgoing de-escalation of the conflict.

55. Over the past 18 months, however, the conflict has exacted a heavy human price. On 3 March 2016, the United Nations Human Rights Monitoring Mission in Ukraine released its latest report on the human rights situation in Ukraine, estimating that at least 9,167 people had been killed and more than 21,044 injured in the course of hostilities.<sup>28</sup> More than 1,000 persons remained missing, underlining the importance of identification and communication regarding the deceased in the context of armed conflict.<sup>29</sup> The Special Rapporteur applauds the work that the International Committee of the Red Cross and others are undertaking to provide training and technical assistance to all sides with respect to searching for, recovering and identifying mortal remains.

56. The majority of these deaths have been caused by shelling, which it would appear has taken place indiscriminately on both sides or without the taking of adequate precautionary steps to protect civilians.

57. The Special Rapporteur is also concerned by allegations that the conflict is being waged in part with inherently indiscriminate weapons, such as cluster munitions and landmines, including anti-personnel mines. Researchers have documented widespread use of cluster munitions by both government forces and armed groups in dozens of urban and rural locations, with some locations hit multiple times. The weapons used were ground-fired 300 mm Smerch (Tornado) and 220 mm Uragan (Hurricane) cluster munition rockets, which deliver 9N210 or 9N235 antipersonnel fragmentation submunitions. For example, there is evidence of cluster munitions having been used by government troops in attacks against Donetsk City (October 2014), Makiivka (August 2014), Stakhanov (January 2015), Komsomolske (December 2014 and February 2015) and Luhansk (January

<sup>29</sup> International Committee of the Red Cross, “Ukraine: best practices in dead body recovery discussed in Lugansk” (23 January 2016), available from www.icrc.org/en/document/ukraine-crisis-best-practices-dead-body-recovery-discussed-lugansk.

and February 2015). Conversely, there is evidence of their use by armed groups in attacks against Artemivsk, Hrodivka and Kramatorsk (all in February 2015).<sup>30</sup>

58. While not taking responsibility for the use of cluster munitions by their own side, high-level officials on both sides of the conflict have condemned their use against civilians by the other party as barbaric savagery.<sup>31</sup> During a 24 October 2014 Security Council debate on the situation in Ukraine, 11 States expressed concern at the reported use of cluster munitions and called for an investigation (see S/PV.7287). While authorities in both Ukraine and the Russian Federation have condemned the use of cluster munitions in populated areas, neither Ukraine nor the Russian Federation has joined the 2008 Convention on Cluster Munitions. However, swift public condemnation of their use demonstrates the growing strength of the emerging customary norm against the use of cluster munitions by any actor under any circumstance, as it constitutes the use of an inherently indiscriminate weapon.

59. Ukraine is party to the Convention on the Prohibition of the Use, Stockpiling, Production and Transfer of Anti-Personnel Mines and on Their Destruction, which establishes an absolute prohibition on the use of anti-personnel mines “under any circumstances”. The Special Rapporteur notes with concern that Ukraine failed to fulfil its commitment to destroy all its stockpiled anti-personnel mines before 1 June 2010. According to its official reports, Ukraine still retains more than 5 million anti-personnel mines. The Special Rapporteur observed signs indicating the continued use of landmines on 12 September 2015, when he attempted to visit the facilities of the Mariupol Airport Base. The entrance to the base and surrounding perimeter had hazard signs warning of the presence of landmines.

60. The Special Rapporteur is concerned by the threat that unexploded ordnance and other explosive remnants of war pose against civilian lives, particularly children. The United Nations Human Rights Monitoring Mission in Ukraine verified numerous civilian casualties as a result of unexploded ordnance left in the battleground, both in Government-controlled areas and in territories controlled by the armed groups. The Special Rapporteur reminds the Government of its obligations under the Protocol on Explosive Remnants of War to the Convention on Prohibitions or Restrictions on the Use of Certain Conventional Weapons which may be deemed to be Excessively Injurious or to have Indiscriminate Effects (Protocol V). According to the Protocol, which Ukraine ratified in 2005, State parties have to mark and clear, remove or destroy, as soon as feasible, all explosive remnants of war in territories under their control. In the event that explosive ordnance used by Ukraine remains in territory outside of its control, the Government has the obligation to provide assistance and information to facilitate the marking, clearance, removal or destruction of the ordnance by a third party. Throughout the hostilities, Ukrainian armed forces have the obligation to record and retain information on the use of explosive ordnance, in order to facilitate its clearance without delay after the cessation of hostilities.

61. More generally, the Special Rapporteur is worried by the extent to which reporting on the conflict is being instrumentalized by all parties using mechanisms that ought to be exercising an accountability function with respect to their own forces. Instead of responding to, investigating or prosecuting cases of indiscriminate shelling by their own military forces, each side is dedicating its time to documenting in laudable detail the violations of the other side with a view to continuing their confrontation in national or international courtrooms.

B. Right to life in areas controlled by the Government of Ukraine

62. The “anti-terrorism operation” is being undertaken across the two regions of Donetsk and Luhansk; however, the “contact line” demarcating the boundary between territory controlled by the Government of Ukraine and territory not under its control runs through the middle of these two regions. During his visit, the Special Rapporteur was able to cross the “contact line”, and so here presents his findings on the protection of the right to life on both sides.

1. Indiscriminate shelling

63. The Special Rapporteur is concerned by some of the weaponry used by forces on the Government side in the course of hostilities. Some of the weapons used are inherently insufficiently precise to be used within a highly urban and civilian-populated conflict zone. In other cases, weapons with a known level of precision are being used contrary to or without regard to proper standard operating procedures for targeting.

64. Moreover, he was not convinced during his engagement with relevant authorities that proper investigations had been conducted when allegations of civilian casualties were brought to their attention. The answer from some of the military authorities to questions about when an investigation into allegations of excessive civilian casualties would be triggered, was that such a situation would never arise, because there was an order by the Minister of Defence that this should not happen.

65. While the Special Rapporteur understands the difficulties of conducting investigations in territory outside the control of the Government’s armed forces, such difficulties should not be understood, as suggested in many of the meetings he had, as a reason to reject any possibility of verifying civilian casualties caused by shelling or of assessing alleged violations of international humanitarian law. The conflict is being closely monitored by several international organizations, which publicly report the occurrence of civilian casualties on both sides of the “contact line”. Combined with the military records of Ukraine on the use of artillery, and the possibility of contacting the families of casualties, morgues, hospitals or other sources for verification, it is possible for the Government to assess the damage caused by its use of artillery. Damage assessments conducted this way may not always establish evidence solid enough to allow accountability for violations of international humanitarian law, but credible estimations of civilian casualties would enable the armed forces to evaluate and strengthen precautionary measures taken to mitigate the impact of shelling on civilians.

66. Such basic analysis of the impact of the use of force during armed conflict is a vital first step in a process of accountability for violations of the right to life during armed conflict. At a minimum, all serious violations of international humanitarian law during armed conflict must be investigated and, where necessary, those identified as potential perpetrators must be prosecuted. As has been held by the European Court of Human rights, in particular with respect to indiscriminate shelling, the human rights protection of the right to life continues to imply that there should be some form of effective judicial investigation when individuals have been killed as a result of the use of force in the context of armed conflict.<sup>32</sup>

2. Detention

67. The Special Rapporteur received several allegations of secret detention, in which individuals claimed to have been detained for varying periods of time before being transferred to formal detention facilities. In some cases, this initial detention had taken place in undisclosed locations at the hands of officials thought to be of the Security Service of Ukraine; in other cases, individuals had been apprehended by members of the army or former volunteer battalions.

68. One facility that was mentioned frequently in that regard was the military base at Mariupol airport. During his visit to Mariupol, the Special Rapporteur attempted to conduct a pre-announced visit to this base; however, he regrets that, despite the advance notice, he was denied access to the facility. Other such detention facilities reportedly include the premises of the Security Service of Ukraine in Kharkhiv and Kramatorsk.

69. The existence of unacknowledged, secret detention facilities undermines the effective work being conducted by the national preventive mechanism and the Office of the Ombudsperson to ensure accountability with regard to violations against persons deprived of their liberty. It is disappointing that judges and prosecutors, who are in many cases presented with detainees who bear evidence or account of clear prima facie cases of ill-treatment do not respond more robustly to uphold the rights of detainees. The impunity that exists for acts of violence in such conditions poses a clear and direct threat to the right to life.

3. Alleged summary killings

70. The Special Rapporteur is concerned by reports of bodies discovered near Makiivka, in the Donetsk region, in September 2014. While several of these bodies appeared to be members of armed groups who had died in combat, some reportedly bore signs of having been executed after being detained by Government forces.

4. Integration of voluntary battalions in command and control

71. At the start of the conflict, Ukrainian Armed Forces were underprepared for the nature or the scale of the challenge that would confront them. Not all of the regular forces, to say nothing of the volunteer battalions, had been properly trained in military warfare, let alone the international humanitarian law standards that should regulate the conduct of hostilities.

72. The Special Rapporteur underlines questions concerning responsibility for the actions of volunteer battalions, both now that the majority have been formally incorporated into the Ukrainian Armed Forces or the Ministry of Internal Affairs, and during earlier stages of the conflict. Any extent to which the State is tolerating the existence of unaccountable, politically motivated armed militias on its territory is a concern. The extent to which the State has been actively collaborating with those militias in order to participate in joint military operations against a common enemy suggests that the responsibility of the State for the actions of the members of those groups may be even more direct.

73. These “battalions” in the armed conflict areas, and militias in the rest of the country, exercise coercive violence on behalf of the Government, and operate in a climate of impunity. This is partly a result of the pressure they exert on prosecutorial or judicial authorities, including the police, that attempt to pursue cases against individuals considered by these groups as “patriotic”.

4. Impact of restrictions on movement on the right to life

74. The Special Rapporteur is concerned by the potential (and, in some cases, actual) humanitarian impact of the limitations imposed by the Government on free movement of people and goods across the “contact line”. The long queues of vehicles that the resulting checkpoints inevitably entail have been targeted by shelling. The extent to which the barriers impede the transfer of vital medical supplies to hospitals on the eastern side of the “contact line” also raises serious questions about the appropriateness of the limitations.

C. Right to life in areas not controlled by Ukrainian authorities

75. As noted above, despite extensive efforts on the part of United Nations Human Rights Monitoring Mission in Ukraine, the Special Rapporteur was not able to meet with many representatives of the self-proclaimed “Donetsk people’s republic” or “Luhansk people’s republic”.

1. Indiscriminate shelling and the positioning of artillery in civilian areas

76. Allegations have been made that the forces on the side that is not controlled by the Government are deliberately positioning their artillery within close range of built-up civilian areas and occupying hospitals and schools, so as to effectively use civilians as a shield, or to entice government troops to cause civilian casualties and damage to civilian infrastructure, which can then be used for political purposes.

77. The salience of this problem is demonstrated by the extent to which local populations have taken to the streets to protest it. For example, there are reports that protests were held for this reason in Donetsk on 15 and 16 June 2015.<sup>33</sup> In situations in which people are reportedly reluctant to express dissent, this speaks to the severity of the threat to life posed by these tactics.

2. Summary executions of detainees

78. There are allegations of the killing of detainees held by fighters of the self-proclaimed “Luhansk people’s republic” in Sievierodonetsk, as the fighters were retreating from the city in July 2014. While local police remained in control of their headquarters on Partyzanska Street, the fighters had taken over the police temporary detention facility next door. On the day of the retreat, police reported hearing shots fired from within the facility. Several hours later, after the Ukrainian forces had arrived, the police re-entered the facility, and discovered and documented two corpses in separate cells, each shot either in the neck or in the head.<sup>34</sup>

3. Allegations of quasi-judicial executions

79. The Special Rapporteur was alarmed by allegations of executions in quasi-judicial circumstances, both in the context of “military justice” and in more civilian, “criminal justice” contexts. For example, it is alleged that in May 2014 the “minister of defence” of the self-proclaimed “Donetsk people’s republic”, Igor Strelkov (Girkin), sentenced two local commanders to death by firing squad for looting, armed robbery, kidnapping and desertion.

80. Summary executions may have been carried out under the pretext of “criminal legal authority”. In July 2014, when the Government of Ukraine regained control of Sloviansk, documents were found in the Security Service of Ukraine Building, which had been used as a detention facility by armed groups of the self-proclaimed “Donetsk people’s republic”, that seemed to indicate that armed groups had given death sentences and carried out executions of at least three persons, reportedly based on legislation dating back to 1941.<sup>35</sup>

81. On 18 August 2014, the self-proclaimed “Donetsk people’s republic” announced the adoption of a criminal code that would enter into force on the same day. The code is based in the criminal code of the Russian Federation, and includes the application of the death penalty in cases of aggravated murder.<sup>36</sup> However, lawyers with whom the Special Rapporteur met in Donetsk stated that the “constitution” of the self-proclaimed “Donetsk people’s republic” proclaimed the right to life and that the imposition of capital punishment as provided in the “criminal code” would thus be incompatible with it.

4. Threats against certain groups

82. Amnesty International found strong indications that alleged drug dealers had been executed by forces of the self-proclaimed “Luhansk people’s republic” in the area of Sievierodonetsk. On 3 June 2014, their commander, Oleksii Mozhovyi, had publicly threatened anyone involved in drug trafficking. On 13 June 2014, the police found three bodies of suspected drug dealers.<sup>37</sup>

83. In May and July 2014, there were reports of summary executions by self-proclaimed “Luhansk people’s republic” forces in the area of Sievierodonetsk, Rubizhne and Lysychansk, in the Luhansk region.

5. Targeting of those hors de combat

84. As reported by the United Nations Human Rights Monitoring Mission in Ukraine, on 19 August 2014 part of the town of Ilovaisk came under the control of Ukrainian armed forces. By 27 August, the Ukrainian troops in Ilovaisk had been surrounded by the armed groups of the self-proclaimed “Donetsk people’s republic”. The same day, a humanitarian corridor was negotiated for Ukrainian forces to leave the town. However, at least one column of Ukrainian troops was heavily shelled while leaving Ilovaisk, killing several hundred Ukrainian servicemen, many of whom were wounded soldiers being evacuated.<sup>38</sup> On 14 August 2015, the Ukrainian Chief Military Prosecutor stated that the total losses among the Armed Forces of Ukraine, the National Guard and personnel of the Ministry of Internal Affairs in the incident were 366 killed, 429 injured, 128 captured and 158 missing.

<sup>35</sup> Evidence of the application of 1941 Union of Soviet Socialist Republics martial legislation by illegal armed groups associated with the self-proclaimed “Donetsk people’s republic” to carry out executions was posted online. See Christopher Miller, “Soot-stained documents reveal firing squad executions in Ukraine” (10 July 2014), available from <http://mashable.com/2014/07/10/evidence-of-execution-trial-discovered-in-the-rubble-of-rebel-headquarters-in-ukraine>. The Special Rapporteur received the same allegations from officials of the Security Service of Ukraine when he met with them during his visit, on 9 September 2015 in Kyiv.

<sup>38</sup> Alec Luhn “Anatomy of a bloodbath” Foreign Policy (6 September 2014), available from <http://foreignpolicy.com/2014/09/06/anatomy-of-a-bloodbath>.

85. In January 2015, following the shelling of a bus station in which several people were killed, Oleksandr Zakharchenko, “head” of the self-proclaimed “Donetsk people’s republic”, made a statement on television announcing that his troops would give no quarter, and take no soldiers of the Ukrainian forces as prisoner. Making such a statement is a war crime. However, available evidence does not seem to indicate that this policy was implemented.

86. Also in January, Ukrainian soldier Ihor Branovytskyi was allegedly summarily executed while in captivity by the armed groups of the self-proclaimed “Donetsk people’s republic”. Branovytskyi was among a group of 12 soldiers captured and taken to the base used by the so-called Sparta battalion and severely beaten. When Mr. Branovytskyi collapsed and fainted, he was reportedly executed by the battalion commander Arsenii Pavlov (call sign “Motorola”).<sup>39</sup> During a meeting with the “office of the commissioner for human rights” of the self-proclaimed “Donetsk people’s republic”, the “deputy ombudsperson” agreed to investigate this case.

D. Downing of Malaysia Airlines flight MH17

87. On 17 July 2014, a passenger airliner, Malaysia Airlines flight MH17, en route from Amsterdam to Kuala Lumpur, was shot down over the Donetsk region by a missile that had been launched from the ground, killing all 298 persons on-board and becoming one of the most tragic events in the ongoing conflict. On 23 July 2014, the Government of Ukraine delegated the investigation to the Dutch Safety Board, which led an international team of investigators from Malaysia, Ukraine, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, the United States of America, Australia and the Netherlands. Despite initial difficulties in securing access to the site, on 13 October 2015 the Dutch Safety Board published its report, which concluded that the crash of the flight had been caused by “a 9N314M-type warhead launched from the eastern part of Ukraine using a Buk missile system”.<sup>40</sup> However, the Board claimed that further investigation was required to verify the exact location of the launch, which it could only place within an area of 320 square km. The Board did not have the mandate to identify who had launched the missile. A criminal investigation to hold the perpetrators accountable is ongoing, with the participation of the Governments of Ukraine, the Netherlands, Belgium, Malaysia and Australia.

88. The Special Rapporteur was shocked that a civilian airliner could be targeted in this fashion. He welcomes the investigation work done by the Dutch Safety Board, calls for sustained investigative efforts and hopes that the outcome serves as a reliable basis for accountability and provides relief to the families of the victims.

VII. Conclusions and recommendations

A. Overall remarks

89. The challenges faced by Ukrainian society are real. There are fundamental divisions concerning its geopolitical orientation, which have polarized national identities. A brutal armed conflict with strong international dimensions is further undermining the young national fabric that Ukraine has achieved since its independence. In recent years, against a background of deteriorating economic, social and political conditions, the country has experienced massive demonstrations, which have been manipulated by various political forces and resulted in bloodshed. There is no established tradition of accountability for violations of the right to life or other human rights on which to draw. The current conflict has exacerbated structural weaknesses.

<sup>39</sup> See OHCHR, report on the human rights situation in Ukraine, 16 February to 15 May 2015, para. 31.

90. The Special Rapporteur shares the concerns expressed by the families of the victims, the Council of Europe and the United Nations Assistant Secretary-General for Human Rights, who, in remarks to the Human Rights Council on 22 March 2016, expressed particular concern about “the lack of progress in the investigations and proceedings into the killings that happened [in Maidan], as well as the killings on 2 May 2014 in Odesa and 9 May 2014 in Mariupol,” adding that “the slow progress in these cases undermines public confidence in the criminal justice system. It is essential that they be addressed promptly and with impartiality.”<sup>41</sup>

91. Long-term security will depend on the extent to which a fully functioning system of rule of law, based on the effective protection of the human rights of all persons living in Ukraine, without discrimination, is gradually established. The approach that the Special Rapporteur saw too often during his mission was that, when asked about human rights protection, one side immediately invoked the transgressions of the other. Human rights are being treated as an instrument with which to assail the opponent, not as a shared system of values and accountability. It is the view of the Special Rapporteur that this approach to human rights is lethal; a new paradigm must be found if Ukraine is to escape from the current vicious cycle of violence.

92. The sad truth is that serious violations occur at one point or another in all societies. Ukraine is no exception, and the real question should be how to deal with the violations that occur. Many officials with whom the Special Rapporteur met during his visit, particularly within the Security Service of Ukraine, simply denied any wrongdoing and pointed to the fact that there were laws in place that met international standards. There is little hope for progress where this is the approach.

93. Being realistic and open about the fact that violations may occur is the first step towards addressing them. The second—and decisive—step is to create and utilize mechanisms of accountability to address those violations.

B. Recommendations to all parties involved in hostilities in eastern Ukraine

94. Efforts by all parties to end the armed conflict in the eastern part of the country should be renewed. The ceasefire should be observed and monitored. As long as hostilities continue, all parties must take concrete measures to reduce civilian casualties and adhere strictly to the requirements of international humanitarian law relating to distinction, proportionality and precaution in combat.

95. Proper internal measures of reporting on exchanges of fire should be established. Targeting should be guided by international humanitarian law standards, and be adjusted based on regular assessments of its impact. Allegations of breaches of international humanitarian law must be impartially and independently investigated.

96. It is of great importance to move the conflict out of urban and populated areas. All parties to the conflict should refrain from using weapons that do not allow sufficient precision in this context. They should also refrain from installing their weaponry or artillery pieces in the vicinity of inhabited areas, to say nothing of avoiding schools, hospitals, kindergartens or similar locations.

97. The events at Ilovaisk in August 2014 must be independently and impartially investigated and any perpetrators brought to justice.

C. Recommendations to the Government of Ukraine

98. Ukraine should ratify the 2008 Convention on Cluster Munitions. In the statements of the Government on the use of such weapons by opposing armed groups, the Government has strengthened the idea of an emerging norm against the use of cluster munitions under any circumstance. All parties should immediately desist from the use of such inherently indiscriminate weapons.

99. All remaining illegal volunteer battalions and militias must be disbanded and disarmed, or effectively integrated into the regular armed forces, with effective control and accountability.

100. Likewise, ultranationalist groups and other armed militias, such as Pravy Sektor, Svoboda and “Self-defence”, should be declared illegal and effectively disarmed, disbanded and prosecuted, or brought under the control of the law. Acts of violence or intimidation by leaders and members of these groups must not be tolerated by the Government at any level, and their incitement to violence and hatred against other communities should be sanctioned.

101. A system of independent oversight of all those who perform law enforcement functions must be established, focusing in particular on allegations of ill-treatment by the Security Service of Ukraine. This mechanism should be empowered to conduct investigations into suspected informal detention facilities, including by granting it comprehensive power of search within military or Security Service of Ukraine facilities.

102. The investigations into the events at Maidan in February 2014 and into the events in Odesa on 2 May of the same year must be completed as a matter of priority, and accountability for loss of life established. The systemic failures that contributed to the eventual loss of life, such as the low profile of the police and the delayed response of the fire brigade in Odesa, should also be investigated and, where appropriate, rectified.

103. The difficult situation and suffering of the families of those who lost their lives should be acknowledged by the Government. Their safety, physical and psychological well-being, dignity and privacy must be protected, and they must be promptly informed of progress in the investigations. Public officials must treat them with respect.

104. The Government of Ukraine should consider, in accordance with its standing invitation to all thematic special procedure mandate holders, inviting official country visits from the Special Rapporteur on torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, the Special Rapporteur on the promotion and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms while countering terrorism, the Working Group on Arbitrary Detention, the Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances and the Special Rapporteur on the independence of judges and lawyers.

105. The reservations that the Government has submitted with respect to compliance with the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the European Convention on Human Rights must be reconsidered on a regular basis.

106. The mandate of the Office of the Ombudsperson must be strengthened, including by giving it clear oversight of all places of detention or interrogation, defined broadly as any place in which State officials have (or the Ombudsperson suspects that they have) the ability to detain an individual for any purpose, including questioning.

107. Judges and other court officers must be protected against intimidation.

108. As evidence of a restored, credible system of justice, independent and impartial investigations should be conducted into the individual cases highlighted in the present report.

109. The human rights situation in Crimea must remain under the scrutiny of international monitoring bodies. The Governments who control access to the territory—Ukraine and the Russian Federation—must grant full access to such monitors. However, even without such access, the monitoring must continue.

D. Recommendations to international entities

110. The United Nations Human Rights Monitoring Mission in Ukraine should continue its human rights monitoring in all parts of the country, with a view to verifying human rights violations, bring such violations to the attention of the authorities, encourage corrective action and make its findings public on a regular basis. The Mission should be allowed to monitor the human rights situation in Crimea to establish accurate information to counter false information, rumours or propaganda.

111. The OSCE Special Monitoring Mission to Ukraine and other relevant entities should continue monitoring the military situation in Ukraine and applying pressure to all relevant parties to take steps to de-escalate, disengage and ultimately end the conflict.

E. Recommendations to civil society

112. The Special Rapporteur commends independent civil society organizations in Ukraine for their work documenting violations of international human rights and international humanitarian law, and underlines the importance of that work in supporting both his mission and the ongoing work of United Nations Human Rights Monitoring Mission in Ukraine. He encourages civil society to continue its efforts, with impartiality and in close cooperation with victims of violations and abuses committed by all sides.
